Abstract
Phoenix Mill Ford Plant was the first-ever all-female factory where women earned the same wage as men—something unheard of before or during the 1940s. At its peak, Phoenix Mill employed 70 women. The women who worked at the mill were either single or widowed, because Henry Ford objected to married women who worked outside of the home. The facility’s female employees produced electrical parts, voltage regulators, and switches. During World War II, the mill also produced identification badges and electrical wiring for the M-7 gun director.

The Phoenix Mill is on the site of the former village of Phoenix. The village only flourished for a short time from its founding in 1837 until 1880. Henry Ford bought the mill site in 1919, but he had to rebuild the dam after it broke in 1921. The rebuilt mill was opened in 1922, becoming the third Ford Village Industry Mill.

Scope and Content
The Phoenix Mill Women’s Museum collection consists of materials gathers from area archives and individual papers and photographs. Records and photos from the papers of an individual are largely originals, while materials from other archival repositories are duplicated. The original documents come from people who worked at Phoenix Mill and include letters, reports, photographs and newspaper articles. The duplicated materials consist of articles, photographs and departmental memos, news releases, and related papers. Also included in the collection are oral histories taken from local residents who worked at Phoenix Mill and Nankin Mills.
